Drawing Breath

- an introduction Sheri Wills

Carol Archer's ink drawings perform an act of translation. An interpreter of place, Archer absorbs the physical qualities of her surroundings and filters them through her interior world, before reinterpreting the experience in her drawings. She draws the place into herself, as one would a breath, before drawing it with a brush. In this way, Archer collapses some of the gaps between places, people, and things in her life – and for the viewer, as well. These exquisite drawings are modest in scale (21 x 14.8 cm) and range from detailed renderings to loosely gestural abstractions. They embody a quiet and profound authority that is acquired through the repetition of ordinary activities, deeply considered.

During a series of artist residencies in rural locations throughout Europe in 2015 and 2016, Archer developed a daily practice of walking, while taking pictures of the landscape. The trees are ostensibly the subject matter, but her focus is on light and shadow and the density of patterns in the natural world. She then makes her drawings back in the studio, referencing the photographs and using Chinese ink and brushes on heavy watercolor paper.

The spiritual connotation of engaging in a daily practice, seeking out the transcendent potential of the everyday, is an aspect of this work that runs throughout Archer's practice. Her series Time with the Sky (2009-10) is a group of charcoal and watercolor drawings that look at the ever-changing sky, as framed by tree branches. She depicts the sky as a portal to a larger realm, as seen from one particular vantage point. Archer's work blurs distinctions between personal and universal, between large and small, and between absence and presence.

Archer has been living in Hong Kong and Macao for most of her adult life, and she studied Japanese ink painting and woodblock printing for several years in Kyoto.

Time with the Sky series, 2009 -10.
Charcoal, pastel, watercolour on paper, 56 x 76 cm.

She has a deep understanding and respect for Asian art and culture, while she is equally steeped in the Western genres of watercolor and landscape painting. In Archer's work these divergent traditions intertwine and influence her approach to materials, process, and subject matter in effects that are apparent, both formally and conceptually. Her palette is limited to shades of grey, the format is small, her brushwork loose and assured. In many of the compositions, the unmarked paper is as powerful a part of the composition as the inked areas. In other instances the shadows are more prominent than the things that cast them. These are attributes often associated with Asian art traditions. Yet in this work there is such a palpable sense of her hand and eye — of the individual — that one senses Archer must also be in the room with us, just outside of our field of view. She blends several traditions, both Eastern and Western, but the work is uniquely her own.

Having spent much of her time away from 'home,' Archer returned to her native Markwell, in New South Wales, this year. One can imagine it is a place that is at once familiar and strange to her; it is where she made most of the work in this show. While the idea of returning home often marks a sense of closure, if this work is any indication, for Archer 'home' is as full of mystery as an unknown location. Drawing Breath brings to mind Susan Mitchell's line (from the poem 'Havana Birth'): 'the world is wily, and doesn't want to be held for long.' With this work, Archer translates the experience of place through her individual perspective to render small slivers of the wily world.

A exposição Desenhar. Respirar: por entre árvores teve a sua génese numa série de residências artísticas - Suécia, Noruega, Chipre e Espanha -, todas se concentrando na representação de árvores em locais rurais. A pesquisa artística realizada durante essas residências marca o início de uma nova fase, que mais não é do que o compromisso artístico iniciado com a série Time with the Sky (2010). A maioria das obras da mostra Desenhar. Respirar foi concluída na Austrália, em 2016, e incide sobre as árvores encontradas durante passeios diários ao redor da casa de dois hectares da artista, a meio da costa norte de New South Wales. Os materiais utilizados nos trabalhos de desenho referentes a esta exibição são simples - tinta sobre papel de aguarela. As obras estão organizadas de modo cronológico, numa grande matriz instalada nas paredes da galeria, medindo cada uma 21 por 14.8 cm. No seu conjunto representam uma meditação sustentada e multifacetada de determinados ambientes arbóreos.
